

Ethics, Governance & Anti-Corruption: Frameworks & Codes Training Course

OGI-1179 · 5 days · 15 CPD hours · English

Overview

The Ethics, Governance & Anti-Corruption Training Course from Institute For Oil & Gas Training develops practical capability in managing ethical conduct, corporate governance, corruption exposure and compliance risks across the oil and gas value chain. Ethics, Governance & Anti-Corruption frameworks are essential for organisations operating across complex commercial environments where procurement, joint ventures, agents, contractors, government relationships and international transactions create significant compliance responsibilities.

Oil and gas organisations operate through interconnected relationships involving operators, national oil companies, international partners, service providers, distributors, consultants, agents and government authorities. These relationships require clear governance structures and consistent ethical standards. Weak controls around third parties, gifts and hospitality, facilitation payments, conflicts of interest and approval processes create exposure to regulatory breaches, financial losses and reputational damage.

This course provides a corporate-focused approach to establishing and maintaining effective ethics and anti-corruption frameworks. Participants examine the practical application of the UK Bribery Act, Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, corporate governance principles, board oversight and internal codes of conduct. The programme also addresses tone at the top and the role of senior leadership in establishing ethical expectations throughout an organisation.

A central focus is the ability to translate policy into operational controls. Participants explore how a gifts and hospitality policy operates in practice, how facilitation payments should be identified and controlled, and how organisations assess third party intermediary risk. Agent and consultant vetting is examined as a critical component of due diligence, particularly where intermediaries interact with government officials or support market entry and commercial negotiations.

The programme is designed around the realities of oil and gas operations. Procurement decisions, contract awards, tender processes, licensing activities, customs interactions, project development, joint ventures and international supply chains all create situations in which ethical judgement and governance controls influence organisational risk. The course connects these operational situations with governance frameworks and compliance responsibilities.

Institute For Oil & Gas Training places particular emphasis on decision-making, accountability and practical implementation. Participants learn how to recognise red flags, escalate concerns, document decisions and apply governance controls consistently. The programme also considers the relationship between corporate policies, management responsibility and individual accountability.

The course addresses the difference between having an anti-corruption policy and operating an effective anti-corruption programme. Effective governance requires clearly defined responsibilities, appropriate oversight, proportionate controls, documented procedures and management commitment. These elements must operate together across the organisation rather than remain confined to a compliance department.

Participants also examine the importance of board oversight and management accountability. Senior leaders establish expectations through the tone at the top, but ethical culture depends on those expectations being reinforced through recruitment, training, procurement controls, third party due diligence, reporting mechanisms and disciplinary processes.

The course supports professionals responsible for compliance, risk management, finance, procurement, legal affairs, contracts, internal audit, governance and operational management. It is equally relevant to managers who make or approve commercial decisions and need to understand the compliance implications of those decisions.

Institute For Oil & Gas Training delivers the programme as a practical corporate development course, enabling participants to connect regulatory requirements with organisational procedures. The emphasis remains on usable knowledge that supports stronger governance, more consistent controls and better management of corruption risks.

Objectives

- Understand the foundations of Ethics, Governance & Anti-Corruption frameworks within oil and gas organisations
- Interpret the principal compliance expectations associated with the UK Bribery Act
- Understand key anti-corruption requirements under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act
- Identify corruption risks arising from agents, consultants, contractors and other intermediaries
- Strengthen third party intermediary risk assessment and due diligence practices
- Apply practical approaches to agent and consultant vetting
- Recognise inappropriate payments, facilitation payments and other corruption red flags
- Apply an effective gifts and hospitality policy to common business situations
- Understand corporate governance principles relevant to ethical decision-making
- Clarify board oversight responsibilities for ethics, governance and anti-corruption programmes
- Understand the significance of tone at the top in establishing organisational ethical standards
- Strengthen escalation, reporting and documentation practices
- Improve awareness of conflicts of interest and associated governance controls
- Connect corporate codes of conduct with operational decision-making

- Support consistent implementation of anti-corruption controls across business functions
- Identify weaknesses in existing governance and compliance processes
- Develop practical responses to potential ethical and corruption risks
- Strengthen individual accountability in commercial and operational decisions

Training methodology

Institute For Oil & Gas Training uses a practical and scenario-driven methodology designed around the commercial realities of the oil and gas sector. The course combines expert-led discussion with case studies, compliance scenarios, group exercises, decision-making simulations and structured analysis of governance situations.

Case studies examine situations involving third party intermediaries, procurement activities, gifts and hospitality, government interactions and potential conflicts of interest. Participants assess the circumstances, identify compliance concerns and determine appropriate escalation and control measures.

Real-world scenarios are used to demonstrate how ethical risks emerge during normal business activity. A commercial relationship that initially appears routine can involve an agent, consultant, supplier or intermediary whose activities require enhanced scrutiny. Participants work through the indicators that distinguish ordinary commercial activity from potential corruption exposure.

Group exercises focus on policy application. Participants review hypothetical gifts and hospitality situations, evaluate proposed payments and identify appropriate approval routes. These exercises reinforce the importance of applying documented controls rather than relying solely on individual judgement.

Simulations provide an opportunity to examine management decision-making under operational pressure. Participants consider how business objectives, commercial deadlines and compliance responsibilities interact. The exercises demonstrate how a strong governance framework supports informed decisions without creating unnecessary uncertainty for operational teams.

The programme also uses governance mapping exercises to examine the relationship between boards, executives, compliance functions, business units and operational personnel. Participants identify responsibility gaps and consider how board oversight and management accountability support effective control environments.

Regulatory comparisons form another important element of delivery. Participants examine the practical implications of the UK Bribery Act and Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and consider how international organisations manage compliance obligations across different jurisdictions.

The methodology encourages participants to challenge assumptions, identify red flags and discuss appropriate escalation routes. This makes the programme particularly relevant to experienced professionals who need to apply ethics and governance requirements within active business environments.

Organisational impact

An effective Ethics, Governance & Anti-Corruption programme strengthens the organisation's ability to identify and manage conduct and corruption risks before they develop into significant compliance issues. The course provides participants with practical knowledge that supports stronger controls across procurement, contracts, finance, operations and third party management.

Organisations benefit from greater consistency in applying anti-corruption policies. Employees involved in commercial decisions gain a clearer understanding of when issues require approval, escalation, investigation or additional due diligence. This creates more structured decision-making across business units.

Stronger third party intermediary risk controls provide organisations with a systematic approach to assessing agents, consultants and other external representatives. Better agent and consultant vetting supports informed decisions about who the organisation engages, why the relationship is required and what controls are appropriate.

The programme also strengthens governance around gifts, hospitality and business courtesies. A clearly understood gifts and hospitality policy helps employees recognise potentially problematic situations and apply approval requirements consistently.

Improved awareness of facilitation payments supports stronger controls around payments to officials and other parties. Participants understand the importance of identifying payment requests, escalating concerns and maintaining appropriate documentation.

Board oversight is another organisational benefit. Directors and senior executives gain a clearer understanding of how governance responsibilities connect with compliance structures, management reporting and organisational accountability. Effective tone at the top reinforces expectations across the workforce.

The programme supports stronger integration between compliance and operational teams. Rather than treating ethics as an isolated compliance function, organisations can incorporate ethical considerations into procurement, contracting, project management, finance and commercial processes.

The resulting capability supports more robust internal controls, clearer accountability, stronger documentation and more consistent escalation practices. These improvements contribute to better governance and more disciplined management of organisational risk.

Personal impact

Participants develop a stronger understanding of how ethics, governance and anti-corruption requirements apply to their professional responsibilities. They gain practical tools for identifying risk and responding appropriately to situations that require ethical judgement.

Professionals involved in procurement and contracts strengthen their ability to identify corruption indicators in supplier, contractor, agent and consultant relationships. They gain greater confidence in applying due diligence and escalation procedures.

Compliance and risk professionals enhance their understanding of operational anti-corruption controls and governance responsibilities. The course strengthens their ability to engage with business functions and support practical implementation of corporate policies.

Finance professionals gain greater awareness of payment-related risks, approval requirements, documentation and potential red flags. This supports more effective financial control and compliance monitoring.

Managers develop stronger decision-making capability when dealing with gifts, hospitality, intermediaries, government interactions and potential conflicts of interest. They learn how leadership behaviour influences organisational ethical culture.

Senior professionals also gain a clearer understanding of board oversight, management accountability and tone at the top. These capabilities support effective leadership in organisations where ethical conduct forms part of operational and commercial performance.

The course contributes to professional capability in compliance management, governance, risk management, internal controls, procurement and corporate responsibility. Participants leave with a more structured approach to recognising concerns, documenting decisions and escalating issues.

Course outline

Ethics and Corporate Governance Foundations

This module establishes the foundations of ethical conduct, corporate governance and organisational accountability in the oil and gas sector. It examines how governance structures influence behaviour and how ethical expectations are translated into policies, procedures and management practices. The module introduces tone at the top, accountability and the relationship between leadership behaviour and organisational culture.

Anti-Bribery Laws and Compliance Responsibilities

This module examines major anti-bribery requirements affecting organisations operating across international markets. It focuses on the UK Bribery Act and Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and explores how these frameworks influence corporate compliance programmes, payment controls, third party relationships and interactions with public officials.

Third Party and Intermediary Risk Management

This module focuses on one of the most important operational areas of anti-corruption compliance: managing third party relationships. Participants examine third party intermediary risk involving agents, consultants, contractors, distributors and representatives. The module develops practical approaches to agent and consultant vetting, due diligence, approval, monitoring and documentation.

Gifts, Hospitality and Commercial Conduct

This module examines everyday business situations that require careful ethical judgement. Participants explore gifts and hospitality policy requirements, conflicts of interest, facilitation payments and interactions with customers, suppliers and public officials. The focus is on applying consistent controls while supporting legitimate commercial relationships.

Governance Assurance and Anti-Corruption Implementation

The final module integrates governance, ethics and anti-corruption principles into an organisational control framework. Participants examine how boards, executives, compliance teams and operational functions work together to maintain effective controls. The module focuses on governance assurance, reporting, monitoring, internal controls and continuous improvement.
